

THE STUBBORN ANOMALY OF AUTISM

Life gets more interesting and worth living as I age. I can now exercise the greatest power that human beings are endowed with: the power to choose. I can decide where I am, what I do, and what I think. Before, when I was working for other entrepreneurs, I couldn't do what I so desired to do but now I can do what I've been dreaming of doing. For decades, I've been obsessed with overriding questions of why our autistic children were ostensibly mindless, unable to think & make sense of themselves and their environments: why were they NOT conscious enough of themselves & of their own existence. Only recently, after 5 decades of my life, can I investigate the mystery inside ourselves, not in our surroundings, and begin to unlock the secrets of autism one by one.

It is the journey to explore the feature of the soul (consciousness) that makes it a mind that excites my life. It's so gratifying to be able to do what I think of as the best theme to ponder. I used to think over the past 20 years to have the opportunity of understanding "ourselves," as I couldn't figure out my own children who were so much different from other human species in terms of their capability of doing what others can do. I feel so intriguingly challenged to explain who we are, our awareness of being us, ourselves. So far, in my research, I found no credible concept that satisfactorily describes the anomaly of autistic beings despite prodigious scientific breakthroughs over the last two centuries in many fields.

Currently, we have a better understanding of the world we inhabit, of the forces that drive it, of the relationships between the human race and the rest of the universe. At the same period, little by little we have learned how life evolves & reproduces itself, as well as the structure of the brain, and how it works. Nevertheless, when autism is declared pandemic by the United Nations, its anomaly—its origin and astronomical growth—remains as mysterious as before. Such a mystery is appalling, as autism, more than anything else, is "the" fast-growing species of the human race that we cannot account for, an integral part of us that we don't really understand and hence can't resolve it, for we have traditionally neglected the issue of subjective consciousness hitherto.

Given this apparent impasse, as a father of two autistic children, I searched here and there for other approaches. This endeavor was not futile, as I found a panacea with the aid of Ms. Edeltraud Grace, an energy-based approach that proves effective in transforming my children into thinking beings. This silver lining is the Biomagnetic Healing treatment that evidently has changed the way my children think now with them beginning to be able to think in abstract terms. It is with the methods and techniques developed by Mr. Johanna Arnold. I can currently clear lots of mystery in the autism puzzle.
